Complementary to the data obtained through the exegesis of ancient texts, the molecular study of specimens of both parasite and host, both ancient and modern, provide us with insights in the "arms race" and the response of both Valley. Documents, such as the Ebers papyri, provide us with insights in the pathology of the disease, as well as the remedies sought and a description of the type of water environment in which the infectious occurred.

Complementary to the data obtained through the exegesis of ancient texts, the molecular study of specimens of both parasite and host, both ancient and modern, provide us with insights in the "arms race" and the response of both

Valley. Documents, such as the Ebers papyri, provide us with insights in the pathology of the disease, as well as the remedies sought and a description of the type of water environment in which the infectious occurred.

Ultimately, the implications of such research can be expected to go beyond the grounds of scholarly study and have important medical implications particularly in light of the ongoing vaccination research of the Shistosome Project (Natural History Museum, London) and the United Nations Schistosomiasis Strategic Research.